Casa Esagono is a residential structure built by Vittorio Giorgini in 1957. Its peculiarity lies in the hexagon shape that makes it interesting as a first example of modular structure. In fact, starting from this basic form, the author thought it was interesting to design a housing system that could in some way be composed of different cellular structures; an explicit reference in nature can be found in the reticular structures of beehives. The Esagono house is also raised from the ground by wooden pylons that insulate it from the thermal point of view in order to combat the humidity that obviously, given the seafront position, is present. The "aerial" solution adopted by Giorgini is certainly almost prehistoric, but at the same time modern, not to mention futuristic.

The path to reach Casa Esagono starts from our rent, along a couple of farmhouses where you can admire their animals, continues through the pine forest of the park of Rimigliano and a stretch of cliff overlooking the sea. The house appears from the vegetation in all its splendor. In its proximity you can also see Dinosaur House.
